

MRS. CARR'S GUEST

By Horatio Lee Allen

Celia knew exactly when Paul's manner toward her changed. They were engaged at their usual supper occupation, sitting on Celia's porch recounting the incidents of their day-long separation, for Paul kept books and Celia taught school through most of the working hours.

They lived in adjoining houses, and even if they had not loved each other, it would have been natural to Paul to prefer to sit with Celia on her porch rather than alone on his own.

They did love each other and though nothing was really settled yet, it was understood that they would be married as soon as they could afford to set up housekeeping. Most of the money Celia earned went to the bank for the purpose of buying linen and china when they were needed. And Paul was saving just as carefully, in larger amounts, for he earned more.

They were very young and happy people, to be envied, Celia thought until that evening.

She had a new dress, blue lawn with a bit of white lace to set it off. Her smooth hair was very smooth and her smile very glad. Paul, being a man, was not very observing of woman's attire, but he was sure to notice hers sooner or later. As it was he had looked at her approvingly, and to Celia, who could distinguish degrees in his admiration, that was almost happiness enough.

While she sat waiting with her hands clasped, the front door of the house opposite opened and two women came out and sat down in the comfortable looking chairs standing there. One of the women was Mrs. Carr, who lived in the house, a gay young matron who had little in common with her placid neighbors, and the other the guest who had come that day from the city to stay with her for a time.

The strange woman was young. As for looks, she might have stepped bodily from a page of the latest fashion journal. Her gown was blue but not the crude blue of Celia's cheap lawn. Its delicate texture expressed itself in alluring effects of shadow and shadow. Her sleeves were very long, her collar very high, her skirt very narrow—obviously she demonstrated the last idea in style. And her hair—blonde, crisp, profuse, one mass of waves and puffs and bewitching little curls all around bound together, as it were, with a fillet of blue that matched her gown.

Celia had never seen such a dress or such hair. She felt keenly the difference between herself and the city girl, and wondered if Paul felt it, also. When he spoke she knew that he did.

"Great Scott!" he exclaimed so did "what's that?"

"Some friend of Mrs. Carr's," Celia answered.

"My, she's great!" The girl groaned, aware that she was creating a sensation with these country livers, flitted prettily with Spunk, Mrs. Carr's fox terrier puppy who had followed them out upon the veranda, and raised her voice so that it could be heard distinctly.

"Don't let Spunk put her feet on your dress, Marie," Mrs. Carr said anxiously.

"She won't hurt this old gown, I guess," the girl cried.

"Old gown? Gee!" Paul glanced at Celia, and finding the apparition across the way more engaging, thereafter confined his attention to her.

Celia was beyond speaking. The most she could do was to choke back her tears. Never before had Paul even noticed any other girl in his presence. She began to feel jealous. She began to think that she had forced in vain.

Paul went home a little earlier than usual, wondering what was the matter with her. The moment he was gone Celia flew to her room and studied the young woman she saw in the glass. The young woman's dress was too blue, and her hair—poor Celia chuckled in it in despair. She had always thought she had plenty of hair, but that girl across the way had pounds where she had carous. She had never seen so much hair on any one head in her life. Blonde hair, too! She loved blonde hair. Here was ugly and dark.

Celia dropped her head on her arm and cried as she had never cried before; cried not so much for the blonde hair as for the principle of beauty it represented, which was strong enough to draw her lover's attention from herself.

As the days went on, Celia became more and more heartless. Paul came dutifully to sit with her each evening, but his eyes and ears were all for the young person across the way, who sat with him as freely as was consistent with good behavior. And Celia had to sit by meekly and see him admiring another girl. She was not so angry as she was hurt; not so jealous really as she was despairing. It was too bad, yet what could she do save hope and pray that the disturbingly fair Marie would take her charms elsewhere?

Though Paul said nothing, she felt his growing dissatisfaction with her each time his eyes rested upon her. One delightful Sunday afternoon they were sitting together as usual, on Celia's porch. So far there had been no sign of Marie, but Celia knew that her appearance was pending, for she could see a stir behind the thin curtains of the Carrs' guest chamber.

The Carrs did not go to church Sunday mornings and rose late and Celia had no reason to believe that they had altered their custom on account of their visitor. Marie was evidently dressing. The girl's heart beat fast. She could not talk, and Paul did not care to. He also was waiting, but with other feelings than hers, for Marie to emerge from the open front door. Paul was too humble to seek a speaking acquaintance with his charmer; he was quite content to admire her at a distance. Moreover, being a man and peculiarly guileless of the ways of women generally he could not see that he was hurting Celia as much as if he positively spurned her. In his opinion, his admiration of Marie detracted nothing from his allegiance to the girl he still intended to marry.

As they sat there—the one expectant the other miserable—a shriek sounded from the house opposite. There was a rush of feet, a frantic calling of "Spunk! Spunk!" and out through the open front door came Mrs. Carr's fox terrier puppy. In her mouth she carried something which dragged as she ran, and she was running straight across the street. After her came Mrs. Carr in a pink kimono, running like a mad woman in an effort to overtake the dog. Midway of the dusty street Spunk paused to toss and tussle the property she had stolen.

And now a third participant appeared in the absurd scene—another kimonoed figure, wringing hands and urging pursuit—a very forlorn figure with a tiny string of blonde hair hanging in her eyes, and cheeks pathetically devoid of all freshness. It was Marie.

"Spunk! Here, good doggie!" Mrs. Carr had all but laid a hand upon the thief, when the puppy skipped with an impetus that carried her to the foot of the steps. Looking, she perceived refuge in Celia, and with an other skip and hop carried her burden to Celia's feet. Celia gave it one look horrified, comprehending, but Paul reached down and picked it up—a long, brown, fuzzy article, from which dangled a number of blonde puffs and curls. His face was a study in disgust as he extended the thing toward Mrs. Carr, who came panting up for it. Her plump face, a little sallow since it lacked its usual coating of powder, was scarlet with exercise and vexation.

"Thank you," she said; "it's Marie's. She was dressing when Spunk got it. I'd like to kill that dog!" and she turned and went home.

There was silence, during which the blue kimono disappeared from the front door and the pink one followed in its wake. There was a chorus of loud laughter, evidently from Mr. Carr, and of hysterical voices which trailed finally back to the guest chamber.

"Great Scott!" Paul exclaimed. "So that's what she wears on her head! And her cheeks were as colorless as my hand!"

Celia was laughing sobbingly.

"But she's always like that—morning, noon, and night. I've seen her. She never fixes up till noon."

Paul turned and looked at her suddenly conscious of her gaudiness and color, of her blue dress and shining hair.

"Maybe it's fashionable," he said, "but it's—dreadful disgusting, I call it. Don't you ever put one of those things on your head, Celia. You hair is pretty enough just as it is."

"Do you really like it, Paul?" Celia asked, vivid with happiness.

"Like it? I guess I do. It's the love I feel for the world, and you're the loveliest girl!" cried Paul in a sudden burst of affection.

Delightfully Situated.

Jeremy Sanderson, the sociologist of Duluth, was condemning the international marriage that gives an American girl's beauty and millions to some elderly and withered nobleman.

"Those mercenary foreign hounds that flock our girls," said Mr. Sanderson bitterly, "are well off—well off, I mean, in the Calhoun use of the term."

"If Clay Calhoun, testifying in at assault case, spoke of one Washington White as 'well off'."

"Now, witness," said the cross-examining lawyer, "when you declare White to be well off, what do you mean?"

"No, sah, O no sah," said Calhoun. "Is he worth $5,000?"

"No, sah. Mah gracious, no?"

"Is he worth $1,000?"

"No, sah, he ain't worth 17 cents."

"Then how is he well off?"

"Bekase, sah, his wife am A No. 1 washday and keeps de full family in buns and oyle."

Where Courtship is Dangerous.
Four young men have been shot at Vex (Valais) by an irate father to whose daughter they had come to pay court, says the London Express. They were refused admission to the house, and when they tried to force their way in the father took down his gun and fired. Two of them were slightly wounded and the other two seriously. The father was arrested.

The encounter and its almost tragic ending were due to ancient custom which prevails in the villages of the canton of Valais and in the Alpine hamlets of the German cantons. After a girl has reached the age of eighteen her parents are not surprised to receive the visit of several young men active the day's work to ask to see their daughter and pass a pleasant evening in the family circle. The visit is looked on as a compliment, and as the young men bring with them wines and food they are generally welcomed by the parents. The custom, which is known as Velles, results in introductions and often in marriages.

Notice is hereby given that on the 30th day of August, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m. at the court house door in the City of Tombstone, in the said County of Cochise, I will sell the above described property or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the said judgment, with interest, costs and accruing costs, to the highest and best bidder for cash.

JOHN P. WHITE, Sheriff.
By A. A. Hopkins, Deputy Sheriff.
Tombstone, Arizona, August 7, 1911.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE
In the Probate Court of the County of Cochise, Territory of Arizona.

In the matter of the estate of Clyde T. Scott, deceased.
It appearing to this court by the petition this day presented and filed by Emil Marks, administrator of the estate of Clyde T. Scott, deceased, that it is necessary to sell the undivided one-third interest of said estate in lots numbered 14 and 15 on the Erie Cattle claim in the Warren mining district, Cochise county, Arizona, to pay the debts of decedent and the expenses and charges of administration and the mortgage existing thereon;

It is therefore ordered by this court: That all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Probate Court on Tuesday, the 12th day of September, 1911, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day at the court room of said court at the court house in the city of Tombstone, Cochise county, territory of Arizona, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said Emil Marks as such administrator to sell the said real estate and that a copy of this order be published once a week for four successive weeks in the Bisbee Daily Review, a newspaper published in the said county of Cochise.

Dated August 12, 1911.
